A NOTE ON THE AUTHOR

The Torquemada Puzzle Book was published by Gollancz in 1934 and written by Edward Powys Mathers (1892-1939).

The author's nom de plume was Torquemada, a name linked to the Spanish Inquisition, for Edward Powys Mathers (known to his friends as Bill) believed that puzzles should be mind-bendingly difficult but equally rewarding when the solution was found. He introduced the cryptic crossword to England in 1924 through the pages of the Observer newspaper.

The British love a puzzle and grow very attached to crossword compilers, always looking forward to the next week's puzzle, and Torquemada had many loyal supporters. John Dickson Carr (author of The Hollow Man, voted the finest locked-room' murder mystery of all time) was a friend. He believed that "there has never lived a man with such a wide knowledge of sensational fiction. Torquemada of the Observer read everything that was being written and was already familiar with everything that had been written. And he never forgot any of it.'

Powys Mathers was acknowledged as a brilliant translator and was responsible for an edition of The Thousand Nights and One Night, more commonly known as The Arabian Nights. The beautiful poem Black Marigolds' (a favourite of the UK's former Poet Laureate, Carol Ann Duffy) was another of his contributions. He was also a critic specialising in reviewing crime fiction.

In 1934 he published a selection of his puzzles under the title The Torquemada Puzzle Book. As well as some gloriously difficult crosswords, the book contained spooner-istics, verbal games, telacrostics, triple cricket acrostics and anagrams - enough to keep a family occupied for weeks.

The final 100 pages of the book contain the novel-cumpuzzle Cain's Jawbone.
